Helping Family Businesses Achieve and Maintain Success

From the Director

Dear Friend of the Center,

We are coming off one of the most exciting seasons here at the Center. In March we celebrated our 15th anniversary with a very special event at the Henderson House. It was great to see so many of our current members mingling with past members and guest who attended. We had a full house of great fun and celebration. To make the night even more spectacular we had as a special guest speaker Leon Gorman, chairman, former president for 30 years, and grandson of the founder of L.L.Bean. Mr. Gorman gave us some great insights into the L.L. way and graciously signed copies of his book, L.L.Bean: The Making of an American Icon. A great time was had by all and we appreciate that he and his wife Lisa were kind enough to come down from Maine to join us.

Additionally, we just wrapped up the first-ever Massachusetts Family Business Awards which was co-sponsored by the Family Firm Institute New England Chapter. The event honors Massachusetts family business for all they provide to the commonwealth and community. We'll have more information about the Awards program with details coming in the next Quarterly.

As always, we encourage you to reach out and inform other family firms about the Center. Your referrals are our best resource for new members.

Sincerely,

Ted Clark

special event:

Leon Gorman, chairman and grandson of the founder of L.L.Bean

“Sell good merchandise for a reasonable profit; treat your customers like human beings and they’ll always come back for more”

- L.L.’s Gold Rule

Leon Gorman was our distinguished speaker at our recent fifteenth anniversary event. He took this opportunity to talk about his new book, L.L. Bean: The Making of An American Icon, in which he describes how the nearly 100-year old Freeport, Maine-based merchant grew from $2.2 million in sales in 1960 to over $1 billion in sales currently. Joining the company in 1960, Gorman became President in 1967 when his grandfather L.L. Bean passed away. Gorman confessed humorously how the firm attempted to keep the death of the founder a secret from the customers, out of concern that they might stop shopping.

He also described his working relationship with his grandfather, mentioning that L.L.Bean was not always a positive influence and that in many ways he held back the growth of the business. He compared the differences as being that of “change vs. status quo”. He described how change was also difficult for the employees to accept, and how Gorman often was “seen as the embodiment of all that was wrong”. Gorman accepted this label and eventually through success of some of his initiatives, the changes were more readily accepted.

In his book, he shares the challenges of carrying on the legacy of L.L.Bean and the “old-fashioned values in a rapid growth environment”. Especially interesting was his experience of professionalizing the family business. The most important aspect, planning, wasn’t resisted by senior managers, but he does describe them as being less than enthusiastic. He felt that L.L.Bean was becoming professionally managed, but was still very “hands-on and entrepreneurial in leadership”. Gorman wanted to “retain some of the benefits of being small and uncomplicated” while adding some of the advantages of a more formal organization.

In 1996, with sales declining for the first time, a fundamental strategic review was completed with help from an outside advisor, the Boston Consulting Group. He also approached Peter Drucker, the renowned strategic planning expert, about the same time concerning L.L.Bean’s strategic planning initiatives. Gorman recalled how even Drucker, a long-time Bean customer was “a bit taken aback” that L.L.Bean would be engaged in strategic planning. Drucker commented “Don’t change unless there is no other alternative”.

The speaker presentation was capped by a book signing which provided members the opportunity to meet Mr. Gorman in a more intimate setting. ■

The Center Welcomes Middlesex Savings Bank
as a New Sponsor

This Spring the Center for Family Business was privileged to add Middlesex Savings Bank as a new sponsor

Middlesex Savings Bank, understands the important role that family businesses play in our communities and our local economy. With more than $3 billion in assets, Middlesex Savings Bank is the 2nd largest mutual bank in Massachusetts, and the 6th largest mutual bank in the country, they're big enough to offer commercial expertise and a host of competitive products, yet, they're nimble enough to partner with their customers to understand their unique needs and to deliver customized financial solutions-regardless of the size of the business. Their commitment to providing outstanding and memorable customer service is one of the most important differences between their Bank and other financial institutions. What also differentiates them from others is their team of seasoned bankers focused on small and medium-sized businesses. Family-owned and operated businesses are both a major segment of their customer base and critical drivers of the state's economic engine. They look forward to assisting Northeastern's Center for Family Business in meeting their challenges and to help them grow and prosper.

When Is It Time To Delegate Company Projects?

by Amy M. Schuman
Family Business Consulting Group

Assigning a next generation successor to direct a central, challenging and visible company project is a great way to have them prove themselves while at the same time meeting an important company need. But is it always a good idea?

It is true that one of the best ways to learn the realities of business leadership is by tackling real leadership challenges. These high-stakes experiences have a way of pushing people beyond their current skills in a quantum way that wouldn't otherwise take place. And this doesn't apply to the young, people at all stages of their careers can benefit from a new challenge.

However, it's important not to set anyone up for failure. The "sink or swim" approach can work as long as no one is being thrown into a hurricane. Sit down with Suzanne and scope out the project. Set up an approach that's stacked in favor of success. If Suzanne has never led a project of this magnitude, consider pairing her up with a "shadow coach", someone in the organization that has tackled a similar effort successfully that can give her the benefit of his or her learning from experience. This coach can also raise the red flag if the crucial project is going too far off track, before a train wreck occurs.

To Delegate ...

It's a great idea! Suzanne wants to do more for the company. She's been stuck in PR for two years and although she's done well, she has yet to contribute to the central purpose of the company. I think giving her a really difficult and high-profile project will give her the chance she's been seeking to show what she's made of.

Why should we be so protective of the next generation? We never had any training--for our generation it was "sink or swim". The best way to learn is to be thrown into an assignment that demands leadership. She says she wants it, let her have it! We took on huge challenges and did just fine. Why wouldn't Suzanne do the same?

I disagree. If Suzanne can't handle this assignment, we should know it now. We can't overprotect the next generation, we have to discover their capabilities and make the tough succession decisions based on what they show us.

... Or Not

I'm afraid that giving Suzanne too high profile a project with too much at stake is just setting her up for a fall. She's never had responsibility for a company-wide effort. She doesn't have the experience to do well. This is a recipe for disaster, she could humiliate herself in front of everyone and damage her future at the family business.

You can't say that the "sink or swim" approach to our development worked very well for us. Just because our generation suffered that lack of planning, why should the next generation suffer in the same way? Besides, things are much more complicated now and harder to learn. We should make sure Suzanne has the basic skills before we saddle her with such a burden.

Well, it's not that cut and dried. If Suzanne doesn't have the skills right now it doesn't mean she won't gain them over time. I'm not talking about overprotection, just realism. Besides, do you really want to risk the success of this key project?

What can be done to increase Suzanne's' probability of success?

1. CLEAR GOALS: Carefully define the project. What are the goals? What outputs are expected? What is the time frame and the budget? Make sure that she clearly understands and shares your expectations on this vital project.

2. CLEAR ROLES: What is Suzanne's role in the project? Who is she accountable to? Who is supporting her and what exactly are their roles? What other departments and department members will need to participate and are they completely clear and accepting of their involvement?

3. CLEAR PROCESS/PROCEDURES: How will the project unfold? What kind of meetings, reports, measurements and updates will be required?

Whatever you put in place, make sure there are plenty of pre-established checkpoints to ensure that Suzanne – and the project – are on track. It is much better to check in frequently along the way and allow for mid-course correction than to give Suzanne carte blanche to succeed – or to fail miserably. As this is her first high-profile project, build in as much support as possible to ensure her success.

The motto for efforts such as this:
High Expectations + High Support = Success

sets and personalities. Combined with some real life case studies that members could relate to their own experiences, the group discussed personal, family and career goal setting and were introduced to a process leading to the creation of a personal Career Development Plan.

Participants found the time spent with other Forum members heightened the sense of closeness and openness with one another fostering in depth discussions and relationships. They urged that next year's retreat be even more inclusive of spouses and partners and build on the work that was done this year.

"The retreat was a nice change of pace because it provided the time to focus on myself. I learned some valuable lessons about evaluating my own needs, goals and performance. I hope to make it an annual exercise"
